The Earth Summit in Rio de Janeiro (1992) emphasized the fundamental need to integrate environment into all development decisions in order to achieve sustainability, and thus preserve the right of future generations to natural resources, a safe environment and a better life.

The mankind and environmental problems are closely related, and thus, the establishment of ecological limits in which economic activities can develop, as well as multidisciplinary and international co-operation in the Environmental field are of a great importance for promoting sustainable development.

This conference is designed to bring together engineers, scientists and managers, activating in the field of Environmental Protection, from universities, industry, local authorities, policy makers and non-governmental organizations, to discuss and analyze environmental problems, to find practical solutions for these ones within the sustainable development context and also to contribute to public awareness and ecological education.
